<h3 style="font-family:arial; color: white; "> Google began as a search project by Larry Page and Sergey Brin when they were Ph.D. students at Stanford University.
The search engine algorithm they developed was unique because it ranked pages not only based on their content, but on how many other webpages linked back to them.
Page and Brin determined that links to a page were a sign of its online authority, and Google's algorithm therefore returned more useful results, helping propel Google to become the most-used search engine.

Google's algorithm was patented and named PageRank. The current search technology is based on some of these principles, but has evolved to the point where there are many more variables at play.

Although the Google corporation has since branched out to provide many other products beyond search, the search engine is still Google's most popular service.</h3>

<h3 style="font-family:arial; color: white; ">Most of the videos found on YouTube are created by amateurs, but some professional film makers also use the platform to share their work. Virtually all types and genres of videos are posted on the site, from sports accidents to homemade music videos. Copyrighted work also makes its way onto YouTube, which has raised many issues for companies that produce media for traditional outlets such as television.

Because of the nature of YouTube sharing and voting, there have even been cases where new talents got discovered through simple videos, one of the most notable of which is teen pop star Justin Bieber. On the other hand, it is also possible for YouTube stars to profit from the videos they post on the site through YouTube's ad revenue sharing program.</h3>
